

Task 3: Reflective Activity

During my period of reflection, I spent time in prayer and quiet study, focusing on my relationship with Heavenly Father and considering the direction of my educational and professional journey. I reflected on the blessings I have received through my studies and the opportunities to develop talents that can bless others. I also pondered the importance of temple covenants and how they encourage me to become a person of integrity, service, and lifelong discipleship.

One significant insight I received was that my education is not simply about obtaining employment but about preparing to serve God's children through my profession. As I develop technical skills in Information Technology, I also need to develop Christlike attributes such as patience, humility, honesty, and compassion. These qualities enable me to become not only a competent professional but also someone others can trust.

The analogy shared by Elder David A. Bednar regarding intertwined strands helped me understand that my spiritual life and professional life should never be separated. Instead, they strengthen one another. As I seek revelation, work diligently, and maintain ethical standards, my faith influences my professional decisions, while my professional experiences provide opportunities to live the gospel through service and integrity.

This reflection has motivated me to remain focused on eternal priorities while pursuing educational excellence. I feel greater confidence that the Lord will guide my efforts as I continue learning, serving others, and preparing for future opportunities. My long-term goal is to become an IT professional whose technical expertise and personal character reflect the teachings of Jesus Christ.
